Abstract

John Shaw, Education is Key, ECE-A-L-2019-085

Biographical Information Overview: John Shaw was born in Peoria, Illinois in 1957. He grew up in Peoria and graduated from Peoria Spalding, an all-boys school. He then went to Knox College, majoring in Political Science. John received a Governor's Fellowship, allowing him to rotate through state government. He also received a Rotary Fellowship, which allowed him to earn his MA degree from the University of New South Wales in Sydney, Australia. Later, he attended Johns Hopkins University, majoring in Advanced International Studies. John gained work experience through a work study with the European Union, as well as working with the Wall Street Journal in Europe, Market News, and the Washington Diplomat. In all, John spent twenty-six years as a congressional reporter. In 2017, he became the executive director of the Paul Simon Public Policy Institute. John has written several books on Richard Lugar, John Kennedy as Senator, and the Kennedy-Eisenhower Presidential Transition.

Shaw discusses civics education from the perspective of a former congressional reporter. He also reflects on the Paul Simon Public Policy Institute's involvement with civics education training through the McCormick Foundation, as well as their work on effective town halls, the promotion of statesmanship, and renewing Illinois. Shaw also examined the challenges of journalism and the impact of national politics on it over the past sixty years.
